Do we count the blessings in our lives?

Habits are Formed - Even with the simplest things, you know when someone has not formed the habit of saying even a word of thanks. Some people just don't know how to utter the words "thank you" or "I appreciate ...". They find it very difficult to say these words just as they find it exhausting or demeaning to smile. In many homes, do mothers genuinely thank their children when they wash the dishes or mow the lawn? Do husbands thank their wives when they make an effort to make home life a little less boring? Do wives thank their husbands for making breakfast? Do children thank their dads or moms for fetching them from school? I bet they don't. They find saying the words "Thanks, mom" or "Thank you, dear" or "Thanks, honey" beneath them.

From the Heart - It's true that gratitude is a memory of the heart. I believe that whenever we fail to thank someone or show some gratitude we fail to be humble ourselves. We feel this sense of self-entitlement with these thoughts running through our head: Why should I thank my children for doing their homework? Why do I need to thank them for washing the dishes when it's part of their job around the house? Why should I thank my father for putting me through college – that's his obligation! Whenever we give in to these thoughts, we fail to remember that someone has done something good to us, and we forget to seize the chance to show that we are grateful – not necessarily in the material sense, but in the little and simple things in which they can know that we sincerely appreciate their goodness.

The Hard Part - A person who shows us gratitude makes us feel good about ourselves, but when an ungrateful person comes into our lives, it hurts our ego. It ruins our self-importance. His or her ingratitude is a form of rejection. The Lord teaches us that gratitude is not really a Christian concern – that is the hard part. Believe it or not, a Christian's duty is not to feel good about himself/herself for performing good works. We shouldn't expect those to whom we have done good to return a favour or a debt of gratitude. Giving should be its own reward. Of course, this is easier said than done.
